Develop with Transitions

Writers use transitions and linking words to guide readers through a text. The transitional words, phrases, and clauses in an informational article provide structure by showing the logical relationships between details. Different text structures use different transitions. Depending on the writer's purpose, an informational article may follow one of these common text structures.

Structure	Transitions	Example
Cause and Effect	because, as a result, then, since, for, cause, effect	Jackie learned to be a great tennis player because she worked hard at tennis camp.
Time Order/Chronology	first, then, meanwhile, immediately, until, now, next, finally, soon	First , she learned the basics. Then she began to practice her technique daily.

Comparison and Contrast	similar, different, especially, as, yet, like, unlike, however, although, in contrast, but, at first	Her playing style at first was clumsy, but soon she learned discipline and gained strength.
Problem and Solution	as a result, problem, solution, challenge	As a result , her playing improved rapidly.
Process	after, since, during, when, while, first, second, third, next, finally, after that, then, last, meanwhile, in the end	Now she tells other young players, " First , you need a goal. Then you have to practice all the time. Meanwhile , you have to believe in yourself. In the end , you will succeed."

Use Formatting

Formatting allows a writer to highlight important information and words within an informational article. Types of formatting include headings, bulleted lists, bold words, and italics.

The Pink Meanie

The recently discovered pink meanie jellyfish has earned its name. Its arms and tentacles are a soft shade of pink, and this “meanie” devours other jellyfish. Aside from its snacking habits, the jellyfish, officially named Drymonema larsoni, is also remarkable because it is different from other jellies. The pink meanie jellyfish is so different that scientists had to create a new family name for it, something that hasn’t been done since 1921.

A heading tells what the paragraph will be about.

Bold words indicate words that the reader should remember.

Italics indicate a special term—in this case, a scientific name.

My TURN Create a bulleted list from the information in the paragraph.
A writer can use a bulleted list when he or she wants a reader to quickly understand basic facts.

The Pink Meanie

- Its arms and tentacles are a soft shade of pink
- It devours other jellyfish
- It is officially named Drymonema Larsoni
- It is so different that scientists had to create a new family name for it.

Develop and Compose a Conclusion

A writer sums up the events in an informational article with a concluding statement or section. The conclusion provides structure and helps readers understand how they can use the information in the article. For example, a writer may conclude an article with a suggestion about how the reader could learn more about the topic.

Recall Informational Text or Article /Determine an Introduction in writing and its importance in helping the reader to understand the purpose of the writing/Craft an introduction wherein the details flow logically without unnecessary or unrelated content

My TURN Choose a topic and develop a draft. Focus your writing around a clear structure. Be sure to include a conclusion.

How can you sum up the topic of your article?

Identify the Main Idea, Highlight Key Points, Use Concise Language, and Stay Objective

Why is the topic important for your readers to learn about?

Explaining why a topic is important helps engage readers by showing its relevance and value. It also ensures that they see the value in engaging with your content.

What do you want your readers to do with the information in the article?

Encouraging readers to act on the information in your article can make it more impactful.
